In the beginning of the second millennium there were about 3.5 billion people on earth. That's a lot of people! And they all needed computers. But it was a different story. Most of them had only one or two computers, if that. So, for example, a computer was needed by the Mayor of New York. He needed one to manage his district. Or a big company needed it for their payroll. But everyone else had to make do with whatever they could find. So they made computers for themselves, for their family, friends and colleagues. And this is how the tradition of computers began. It was a small idea, but it grew. Fast. For free. And it caught on so quickly that it spread around the world in no time. And by the year 2001 there were more than 3.5 billion computers on earth. But those computers had one problem: They didn't work very well. That was the situation in year 2000. But in the
