Drugs that inhibit dopamine autoreceptor stimulation by alcohol, such as the monoamine releasing agent bupropion, have been shown to improve symptoms of alcohol dependence. This effect may be related to activation of brain reward systems by dopamine. The related serotonergic compound buspirone increases both dopamine and serotonin release, and has been shown to enhance response to alcohol treatment. This study was conducted to determine whether treatment with buspirone would produce a similar effect in alcohol-dependent individuals. A group of 35 alcohol dependent subjects participated in a randomized, double-blind study of buspirone and naltrexone, two drugs that have been shown to antagonize dopamine autoreceptor stimulation by alcohol. Subjects were treated for four weeks with either buspirone, 40 mg, bid; naltrexone, 50 mg, bid; or placebo, bid, in random order. Measures of drinking were obtained before, during, and after drug treatment. Blood for pharmacokinetic studies was obtained before and after treatment. Subjects were then followed for 4 weeks after treatment ended to determine whether buspirone and naltrexone would exert their antiparkinsonism effects. Both buspirone and naltrexone significantly reduced the amount of alcohol consumed, the number of drinks taken per day, and the number of drinks consumed per drinking day compared to the placebo condition. The pattern of drug effects was similar for the two drugs. Both drugs increased the rate of steady-state blood levels of the drug, as expected, and they inhibited the clearance 2edc1e01e8
